SEA TRAP

WHEN Perry Scott received the radiophone message he quickly put the racy Squid about and headed back in the direction he had come. It was utterly ridiculous. He could not make head or tail of it. Blane had radioed:

PERRY SKIPPER SQUID
NEED HELP MEN DISAP-PEARING MYSTERIOUSLY.
STOP HURRY IT. BLANE.

Perry looked at the written message which Rand, his radio operator, had taken down. What the dickens was going on back at Sandakar? And what could be making Blane's pearl-ers disappear? They were all seasoned native divers of long experience. Where were they disappearing?

The message troubled Perry. Blane was an old pal. He was in obvious trouble. Well, it would take the Squid nearly ten hours, speedy as she was, to reach the Sandakar coast and Blane's pearling beds.

Perry called into the speaking tube for all speed that could be poured on. The big craft took the bit in her teeth and fairly leaped through the water.

Perry went below to his cabin and pulled out a couple of books. They were treatises on the Sandakar coast, the natives, the pearling beds, etc. There was nothing to be found in them that smacked of anything mysterious in the entire region. Perry closed the two volumes after an hour's perusal and went up on the deck.

The evening was perfect, one of those beautiful tropical evenings that happened so often in this part of the south Atlantic. He leaned over the rail and gave his thoughts a free rein. Old Blane he had known since high school days and through college. Blane had chosen mining and geology, but had been bitten by the adventure bug even before he got out of college. He had sailed all over the oceans in an old lugger, looking for his fortune, as he always put it.

"Well," said Perry to the breeze, "Blane sure found a mint in those pearl beds. Must have made his fortune a couple of times over in the last few years. . . Wonder what's happening down there?"

Rand brought another radiophone message. This time it was even more urgent:

TWO MORE GONE STOP CAN YOU COAX SOME SPEED OUT OF THAT
HOOKER BLANE

Perry read the message twice and asked Rand to try and get Blane on the radiophone. He followed the operator into the cabin. After a moment, Rand held out the transmitter.

"Got through, sir, but Mr. Blane is not there. Will you talk to Mr. Higgins?"

Perry took the instrument and said, "Hello."

"This is Higgins, Captain Scott," said the man in Sandakar. "I'm sorry that Mr. Blane is not here at the moment. He was called to town just after relaying the last message you received. I know he'd like to talk with you, and he will call you again as soon as he returns. . . . Yes, sir, I shall inform him of your call."

Perry handed back the transmitter. "Sounded like a perfect butler," he told Rand. "Who the heck is he, I wonder? Maybe Blane will be calling again."

But Blane did not call that evening. Even at midnight, nothing had been heard from the pearling beds where mysterious disappearances were taking place.

"You'd better buzz 'em, Rand," Perry told his radio man.

Rand tried for 15 minutes but received no answer.

"Darn funny," Perry said. "Well we're within sixty miles of the coast. Be there soon."

That prediction didn't come out either. A stiff wind blew up a few minutes later, and soon it was blowing a young gale. They had to slow speed and lay to, while the gale blew into almost typhoon proportions. An hour went by. Two. Three. Still the wild wind screamed and hurled mountains of water over the Squid's decks.

It was one of the most violent and sudden storms Perry Scott had ever experienced, and it afforded a good test for the staying qualities of the big craft. She rode it out like a veteran, and Perry was very proud.

When the wind had fallen and the water settled into long easy swells, Rand tried the radiophone again. This time he thought he distinctly heard the instrument lifted from its hook and a man's voice shout something. But he couldn't understand what was said, and the next instant the phone went dead.

Perry was in a real quandary. What was going on at the pearl diving coast? Strange things certainly. They had lost the way during the storm, but now the boat was racing through the rolling water like some great bird. They should reach Sandakar in a couple of hours.

They reached it in one hour and twenty-five minutes. Blane had a fine little harbor and they ran the 'Squid inshore and dropped the anchor. In a moment the small launch was lowered and Perry was shooting toward the neat pier.

Blane met him as he piled out of the launch and the two old friends gripped hands.

"Gad, am I glad you're here!" exclaimed Blane.

"What's the deal, Blaney? I'm all agog. Vanishing pearls—mystery—"

"It's all that, Perry, and more. Look. You know me from 'way back. I'm not cracked. I hire about a hundred divers most of the season. They're all good men. When they start disappearing while down, leaving no trace, wouldn't you get the wheemies?"

"Bad as that, eh?" Perry threw a glance over the good white buildings of the pearl fishery. "Got any enemies?"

Blane made a wry face. "You sound like a D. A. Who hasn't an enemy or two? In this racket you're bound to be a little unpopular with competitors. I suppose I have several, but they couldn't be doing this—this—"

"I know. But have you any real ugly ones—say, someone who'd murder to stop you—or get hold of your pearl mine here?"

Blane considered. "Any of 'em would like to have it. But how the heck could they get it? I own it. I have no intention of selling."

Perry said, "But the psychological value to them of scaring your natives. Have any of your divers left you recently?"

"Why, yes—yes, come to think of it, several of 'em have quit. But what are you getting at, Perry?"

"I'd say that's your mystery, Blaney. Someone wants your diggings here. So they grab a few divers and throw a scare into the others. Eventually you'll have a pack of fellows who won't go down for you."

Blane looked at his friend. "You know, that very thing happened yesterday, and again today. Five of those rescals refused to dive; they're the ones who quit. Maybe you have something there, Perry. But how the devil are we to catch the rat who's doing the dirty work?"

Perry started toward the little office. "I'll figure out something, old man. But right now I'm ravenous. Got anything to eat?"

Blane was instantly solicitous. "So sorry, old chap. Plumb forgot. Come on up. We'll have a fine dinner, best you ever tasted. Got a new Javanese cook."

The early morning found Perry busy working on a contrivance he had brought from his ship. He worked close to the water's edge, under a tent, so that no one could see what he was doing. No use taking chances, if his hunch was correct. And he was pretty sure it was. He was all set for the experiment at eight o'clock.

He launched his queer craft quickly a few minutes later and quietly disappeared beneath the surface of the ocean. He descended fast and the thick glass windows of the craft grew deep-green.

At last the strange craft rested on the sandy bottom of the harbor. Perry looked about, seeing little other than tropical fish, giant seaweed, and the myriad life of the ocean. Then suddenly his attention was attracted to a small submarine—about twice the size of his own—that nosed through the dark waters about a hundred feet from where his own craft rested.

The sub came to a stop and a diver emerged from it and walked to a huge mound that lay on the bottom. To this he fastened a cable, then went back to his sub and disappeared. Nothing further happened for a time.

Then a swirl of water pre-saged the arrival of a pearl diver. The native came down gracefully and stood on his feet. He glanced around, saw the mound and made for it. In his hand was a long knife. He stabbed around the edge of the mound, at last getting his fingers under one of its edges. Then he began prying and lifting.

Abruptly he quit prying, and Perry knew something was amiss. The man twisted and pulled. His hands were securely held. He could not get away. His face held horror. The great mound began moving as the sub got under way. Perry acted then. He sent his craft ahead, leaped out and worked a piece of steel under the edges of the mound. The hands of the native diver came loose, and the man shot upward, fear-crazed.

Perry went after the mysterious submarine which had cut the cable loose and vanished with a burst of unexpected speed. Perry knew his craft was not fast enough to catch it.

He came to the surface, with the cable still attached to the mound. It was a huge abalone, monster of the deep and a well known man trap. Lying on the bottom these creatures hold their great shell lids open to catch prey. Anything touching the edges causes the lid to clap down and nothing escapes.

Perry told his story to Blane.

"Well, I'll be darned!" exclaimed the latter. "Who could it be?"

"That will have to come later," Perry replied. "I can rebuild this little sub to do twice its present speed. We'll waylay our ocean bottom prowler. He's either a murderer or a crafty kidnaper. Give me a few days, Blaney, and we'll have him."

That was the last time a pearler disappeared from Blane's harbor.
